Description

The Bank of Marshall Building is a one-and-one-half-story, brick masonry commercial building designed in a free interpretation of the Colonial Revival style. Its rectangular plan is relieved only by its central recessed entry on its northern elevation. There are no visible chimneys on the building. Its built-up tar roof is set behind a raised parapet highlighted by the limestone-trimmed pediment on the front, and the brick walls rest upon a continuous brick foundation.

The northern or front facade is composed of two large window openings on the first floor -- one rectangular and the other arched -- that is surmounted by a row of five smaller multi-pane windows in the upper half-story, organized into a central group of three flanked by a single window to either side. The two first-story windows are separated by the central, recessed entrance that leads to the single-leaf entrance. The entire facade is capped with a low pediment.

The western elevation is seven bays in length and anchored by its three central, rectangular window bays. A smaller rectangular window to the south is followed by low, tripartite window placed immediately beneath the stone stringcourse that separates the first story from the half-story above. To the north, an arched window separates the central three windows from the large window at the northern end.

Significant exterior details include the arched windows with their stone keystones, headers, sills and trim, the brick corbelling directly beneath the northern pediment, the stone water table and stringcourse, and the other stone trim placed at various points on both principal facades.

Criteria A and C, local significance

Built in 1913-14 by the local builder Jasper Treece, the Bank of Marshall formed with the construction of this building, naming Dr. Sam G. Daniel as president and Hugh Treece as vice-president and cashier. Though it operated through the 1920s, it apparently experienced mixed success thereafter, as local residents recall it becoming insolvent twice during the Depression. It is now a pawn shop.

The Bank of Marshall Building was constructed as an institutional bank building on Main Street in downtown Marshall. Though little else is known about the bank's operations, its construction date of 1913-14 and its unusual application of the Colonial Revival style to a commercial building represent the historic context Searcy County in the World War Era, 1910-1945: Economic Realignment, The Great Depression and World War. Though this was, generally speaking, a period of county-wide economic decline, some construction continued, and particularly in the area of smaller retail businesses and related financial institutions. This particularly true of the earliest years of this period, prior to the economic decline that came with the Prohibition era and its effect upon the county's previously profitable small industries. The Bank of Marshall Building is thus eligible with local significance under Criterion A for its direct association with the down-scaled retail economy that responded directly to the drastic changes taking place in the local manufacturing and transportation base during the 1920's. It is also eligible under Criterion C as a relatively high-style example of a downtown institutional building constructed in brick.
