Describe present and historic physical appearance:

SUMMARY

The Prairie-style Bush-Dubisson House occupies a spacious site comprised of a little more than two lots on a prominent corner in the heart of the Dunbar neighborhood. Its style and the materials of its construction—brick, stucco, tile—dramatically set the house apart from its neighbors. It is one of the most architecturally distinguished homes built by an African American that still stands in the Dunbar neighborhood, and its Prairie-style design would make it unusual anywhere in Little Rock.

ELABORATION

The Bush-Dubisson House exhibits all of the classic characteristics of the Prairie style: a low-pitched, hipped roof with widely overhanging, boxed eaves; two stories, with one-story porches; details that emphasize the horizontal lines of the house; and large, square porch columns.

The massing of the house is asymmetrical. The main (east) facade is dominated by a nearly square two-story, hipped-roofed section that comprises the main block of the house. On the south side is a smaller two-story, hipped-roofed wing that is set back about half the depth of the main section. Projecting off the rear (west) of the main section is another two-story, hipped-roofed wing. Tile is the roofing material used on all of these two-story portions of the house.

A flat-roofed, one-story porch spans the front of the main block of the house while a flat-roofed, one-story sunroom occupies the space between the main block and the south wing. The primary entrance to the house is from the front porch; a secondary entrance opens into the sunroom. The one-story porch and sunroom, along with a low wall encircling a terrace that connects them, serve to reinforce the horizontal emphasis of the home's design. Additional one-story sections, one clad in stucco and another that is brick-veneered, are situated at the northwest corner of the house, between the main block and the rear wing. These sections, containing the breakfast room and kitchen, might be mistaken for additions but are original to the house.

The Bush-Dubisson House does not have the horizontal bands of casement windows that often are a prominent component of the Prairie style, but groups of three windows are found on the second story directly above the front porch, on the south side of the sunroom, and on the first floor at the rear of the main block's north facade. The sunroom windows are metal жалousies (replacements, perhaps for the casements that would be expected in a 1920s sunroom), and there are casement windows in what originally was a second-story sleeping porch at the rear of the house. Otherwise, all of the windows in the Bush-Dubisson House have double-hung sashes in a six-over-one configuration.

Most of the Bush-Dubisson House is veneered in brick, but stucco is used on the one-story section that encloses the breakfast room and on the second story of the rear wing. A single brick chimney, serving a fireplace in the living room, rises through the roofline on the north side of the house near the front corner.

The house has two exterior stairways, one on the north side that was added when the house became a duplex (at the same time, the original interior staircase was removed) and another in the rear that was part of a renovation that adapted the house to its current use as the headquarters of a fraternity on the first floor and rental office space on the second. The back porch also was altered during the renovation, when extensive water damage at the rear of the house had to be repaired. Otherwise, the exterior of the Bush-Dubisson House is largely unchanged.

A concrete slab in the back yard is all that remains of a two-story, stucco-clad garage that was built to accommodate two cars on the ground floor with servant's quarters above.

The Prairie-style design of the exterior does not continue inside of the house, where there are few embellishments. The floors in all of the main rooms are oak, but the painted woodwork is quite plain. The living and dining rooms have cove ceilings, and a brick fireplace is centered on the north wall of the living room. Pairs of French doors separate the living room from the sunroom and the dining room. The sunroom's floor is tile, and the room is said to have originally contained a fountain.

SUMMARY

Built in 1925 for Aldridge E. Bush, a son of the co-founder of the Mosaic Templars of America, the Bush-Dubisson House is remembered by older African Americans in Little Rock as a home they very much admired in their youth: a beautiful brick residence with a large, well-manicured lawn that was encircled by a neatly-trimmed hedge. The house was considered the showplace of the Dunbar neighborhood, especially during the tenure of its second owner, Daniel J. Dubisson, a successful black businessman. Its significance lies in its Prairie-style architecture and in its association with two men who represent the success attained by a limited number of African Americans in early-20th century Little Rock.

ELABORATION

S. E. Wiggins, a black contractor described as "very meticulous about his work," built the Bush-Dubisson House at 1500 Ringo Street in 1925 for Aldridge E. Bush and his wife, Ellastein. A. E. Bush was the youngest son of John E. Bush, co-founder of the Mosaic Templars of America, a black fraternal organization that grew to national scope before its demise during the Depression. A. E. Bush had the house built shortly after he became the Mosaic Templars' chief officer, a position called "National Grand Scribe and Treasurer." He followed in the footsteps of his father and eldest brother, both of whom had held the position before their deaths. Bush's choice of the Prairie style for his new house was unusual in Little Rock, where few homes, even in the most affluent neighborhoods, were influenced by that style.

The house at 1500 Ringo was the second in the block built for A. E. Bush. The first one, a smaller Craftsman-style design, was the work of the architectural firm of Thompson and Harding. It was constructed about 1919 at 1516 Ringo and is listed in the National Register as the Bush House [NR 11/22/82]. The four houses on the west side of the 1500 block of Ringo Street often are said to comprise the "Bush Block" because all of them were built originally for members of the Bush family.

A. E. Bush's life reflects the dramatic progress some African-American families were able to make after the end of slavery. His father had achieved success in the face of enormous obstacles: he was born a slave, orphaned at seven, and struggled to obtain a high school education. Aldridge Bush, on the other hand, had a comfortable childhood and graduated from Gibbs High School in Little Rock before taking a business administration course at Tuskegee Institute and attending Howard University in Washington, D.C. When he returned to Little Rock, he immediately went to work for the Mosaic Templars.

In the early 1930s, Aldridge and Ellastein Bush sold the house at 1500 Ringo to Daniel J. Dubisson and his second wife, Lula. Dan Dubisson was another local success story. Born in 1872 in Tennessee, at the age of twelve Dubisson moved to Little Rock with a brother and began working, initially in a saloon. (A 1907 biographical sketch labeled him a "mixologist.") In 1917, he joined forces with an embalmer to establish an undertaking business which was known as Dubisson Undertaking Parlor at the time he purchased the house on Ringo Street. This business, now Dubisson Funeral Home, remains in existence today. For several years, Dan Dubisson also operated Dubisson Insurance Association.

It was while the Dubissons lived at 1500 Ringo that the house became known as "the hub of social events in that area," as well as the "ideal" residence that young African Americans wished they could have—or at least could visit. Its architectural style and the quality of its construction materials set it apart from all of its neighbors, as did its expansive lawn—which was maintained during the Dubisson era by a "yardman" who lived above the two-car garage. At a time when even famous African Americans were barred from Little Rock's best downtown hotels, the Bush-Dubisson House provided overnight accommodations for Marian Anderson and other notables.

After the death of Dan Dubisson in 1952, the house became rental property and began a gradual decline which first led to its being divided into a duplex and culminated, in the late 1980s, with its being unoccupied, except by drug dealers. In 1989, the local alumni chapter of a black fraternity, Alpha Phi Alpha, purchased the house from out-of-state members of the Dubisson family and launched a renovation that made the house usable by the fraternity as its headquarters. (The second floor is rented as an office.) The house again is full of activity as fraternity members carry out their service projects, most of them designed to help young African Americans.

Amended Items in Nomination:

Significance:
The current documentation fails to establish the individual significance of either Aldridge E. Bush or Daniel J. Dubisson under NR Criterion B. Very little information is provided regarding the specific contributions or accomplishments of these two men. In cases where the significance of the activities, accomplishments, or influence of specific individuals is not or cannot be identified or explained, significance may rest more in the property's representation of a pattern of history and the more appropriate NR Criterion is A.

Bush and Dubisson indeed reflect the broad patterns of local ethnic history associated with the rise of local African Americans during the early twentieth century to positions of increasing power, prestige and economic success.

[Aldridge E. Bush or Daniel J. Dubisson are deleted from the Significant Person(s) box and Criterion A is substituted for Criterion B.]

This information was confirmed with the Arkansas SHPO.

ABSTRACT/SUMMARY COMMENTS:

The Bush--Dubisson House is significant under National Register Criteria A and C in the areas of Ethnic History-Black and Architecture. The house is associated with Aldridge E. Bush and Daniel J. Dubisson, local businessmen whose lives and careers illustrate the broad patterns of local ethnic history associated with the rise of local (second generation) African Americans during the early twentieth century to positions of increasing power, prestige and economic success. The house is a well-preserved local example of prairie-style influenced residential design and stands as a symbol of the men's achievements and status within the local community.
