ARCHITECTURAL SIGNIFICANCE (Describe important architectural features and evaluate in terms of other buildings within the community.)

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE (Explain the role owners played in local or state history and how the building relates to the development of the community.)

The event known as King Philip's War (1675-1676) had a great impact on the early colonial settlers in southeast Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Considerable deaths and material damage were incurred on both sides; however, its close marked the firm ascendancy of colonial power and the end of Native American resistance in the region. Anawan Rock is historically significant as the site of one of the closing confrontations of the war and as one of the few incidents for which an exact location is known. On August 28, 1676, following the death of King Philip in Rhode Island, Captain Benjamin Church and his company of colonists and Indians sought out Annawon, one of two of Philip's remaining chieftains. Surprising him and his men here in Rehoboth, Church forced them to surrender. The Indians offered no resistance and Annawon gave Church Philip's regalia as a symbol of his defeat. Church promised to spare Annawon's life; however, he was called to Boston and upon his return to Plymouth within a few days found that Annawon had been executed.

The incident and its site, Anawan Rock, were described by Benjamin Church in a narrative published in numerous editions (1716, 1772, 1825, 1865, and 1975). The significance of Annawon's surrender is clearly expressed in the introduction of the most recent edition:

"The surrender of Philip's regalia to Benjamin Church by the great Annawon, who had served both Philip and his father Massasoit, marked the real end of these Algonquin Indians. Compared with the standards of literate peoples, who have dramatized or philosophized about their defeats, this was a stoical, inarticulate passing. But it has its own heart-clutching eloquence "(p. 36).*
