ARCHITECTURAL SIGNIFICANCE (describe important architectural features and evaluate in terms of other buildings within community)

The structural history of the Brown House is intriguing. Its present exterior appearance as a late 19th century vernacular structure with Italianate details is deceiving. The owners possess a manuscript written in 1906 by H. E. Brown, a former Brown student (on file at MHC) which gives a brief history of the house. It states that the house was originally built in 1706 as a lean-to structure facing west and rebuilt or "improved" in the 1870s as a Victorian house with the original post and beam substructure. The chimney base location is still apparent in the cellar. The first story is strictly late 19th century, except for some settling, not usually found in ca.1900 buildings.

HISTORICAL SIGNIFICANCE (explain the role owners played in local or state history and how the building relates to the development of the community)

The traditional history of ownerships, as recounted by the same author, follows. The house was originally built by Charles Wheaton in 1706, who kept a tavern here patronized by travelers on "The Old Coach Road." The property was sold to Philip Short, and by him to Horace Bliss shortly thereafter. It then passed to Mrs. Bercherd who sold it to Mr. and Mrs. Robert Brown in 1874. Mr. Brown was a jeweler at Robinson & Co. in Attleboro. His fourth son, Isaac R. Brown, constructed all the farm buildings standing by 1906 on "this immense farm" except the barn (see photo) which had stood for at least thirty-two years previously.

The Brown House is one of two early 18th century structures (see Form #170) which stand as testimony to primary settlement in northern Rehoboth prior to 1750 when the major focus of settlement was southern Rehoboth. Through its reputed tavern function, it possesses associations with one of the first transportation routes in town along Tremont Street. Its architectural transformation in the late 19th century reflects the presence of a street car line along Tremont Street, which brought the beginnings of suburbanization in the area, fostering new life styles and ideals. In its present form, the Brown House illustrates the evolution of architecture within an historically cohesive 200-year context and meets criterion C of the National Register of Historic Places individually.

ARCHITECTURAL SIGNIFICANCE (Continued)

However, clues to an earlier identity are found on the second story. Retention of corner posts, chamfered summer beam with plain stop, and Georgian period door surround doors, and a panelled chimney breast (fireplace gone) provide strong, if limited, evidence to validate, in a general way, the 1906 theme. Other possible sources of information, e.g., the roof construction, are currently unexposed. The west ell was probably added when the house was renovated. At the turn of the 20th century a barn and sheds were located northeast of the house (see photo copy attached).
