DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Union Trust Company Building in downtown Providence is a twelve-story structure of steel framing and concrete, externally faced in brick and stone. It was built in 1901-1902 from designs by the local firm of Stone, Carpenter and Willson, who employed for its ornate exterior the then-prevalent renaissance-revival style, somewhat French-accented. Nine bays wide across its principal (west) façade, it was originally only four bays deep but was expanded to its present depth of seven bays about 1920. The first and second stories were reserved for bank use, the upper floors given over to office suites for rental.

Externally, the first and second stories display a facing of rusticated granite and are treated as one unit (a "base" for the tall elevations above). The first story is of considerable height, and its large window bays are separated from one another by engaged columns of the composite order, "continued" in the second story by rustication and supporting there keystone round arches. Heavy quoined piers define the corners of the building at these two levels. The tall plate glass windows of the ground floor are each divided in two by metal mullions, up to a segmentally-arched transom area; each transom space contains an oval stained glass panel showing the crest of a great banking city of the world. The elaborate central entrance portico of stone on the west front is distyle in antis, and has composite columns supporting a massive entablature with dentils and modillions. Upon the entablature is a balustrade with urns. The broad central doorway within the portico is arched and has reclining figures in relief surmounting it; narrower bays on either side have blind oculi above rectangular windows. (Originally a domed, circular vestibule of bronze and glass was set in front of the entrance. Now there is a plainer, rectangular, interior one instead.) A much less adorned entrance is in the easternmost bay (newer portion) of the north elevation and gives access to an elevator lobby which serves the offices on the upper floors.

The third story has its own treatment of rustication, and the windows of the fourth through twelfth floors are treated with either full, rusticated "Gibbs surrounds" or, alternately, only capping in this style. These stories are covered by brick and trimmed with white Georgia marble. At the building's top, long brackets support a deep, modillioned cornice, above which runs a balustrade with urns--an enlarged version of that over the entrance portico. On the west, two widely-spaced decorative balconies are attached to the fourth story, and one accents the center of the eighth story.

The interior of the ground floor is described in the Savings and Trust Review of September, 1904:

The ground space is 44x96 feet [74x96 after 1920]. It has a paneled ceiling with a carving in the center of each panel. The walls are finished in laquered gold. The counter, which is serpentine in form, is constructed of the finest selected "Old Convent" Siena marble of wonderful uniformity and texture, and is supported by a series of consoles, each of which bears the sculptured head of some divinity. Surmounting the counter is a grillework of chaste design. The floor of the lobby is a series of mosaics with interlacing of the Numidian, Siena, and other famous marbles ...

A stairway at the rear of the large banking-hall just described led to a balcony and to the directors' room. The latter was panelled in dark woods and lighted by three "rococo sunbursts." Stairway, balcony and directors' room are no longer present, and unfortunately a lack of records, of memory and of photographs at the bank prevents better description of these presumably imposing features or of the changes made upon them, and elsewhere within.

As seen today, following the enlargement of the building c. 1920 and major renovations undertaken in 1928 and 1964, the banking-hall has two pairs of square, free-standing piers spaced down its center; they support the "beams" of the ceiling; an angular marble counter--without grillework and replacing the serpentine one--runs around them. The major dividing members of the ceiling are supported by light, decorated brackets where they meet the walls and interrupt the dentilled cornice or entablature running around the room. Each coffer of the ceiling now has a modern lighting fixture in its center. The large, segmental-headed windows on three sides of the room have enframements of plaster moldings topped by decorated keystones. Between the windows, above a high dado, are tall, narrow panels defined by plaster moldings formed of bound stems or stalks expanding into leafage at mid- and angle-points: rococo, but very controlled. In the southern portion of the east wall is the large and elaborate doorway to the vault, with large-scaled surmounting ornament of foliation, a cartouche etc. To the north of the vault there is a door leading to the elevator hall in the 1920 extension. This is treated in marble as a baroque portal with a scrolled pediment, carved foliation, a crest and urns on the banking-hall side, and a heavy broken segmental pediment on consoles on the corridor side. The stone or "mosaic" floor of the banking area is now covered by carpeting.

The elevator hall has a marble pavement with an inlaid border; its walls are partially panelled in marble; the ceiling is a panelled plaster barrel-vault. The upper, or office, floors have expectedly simple trim: corridors paved in dull white marble, light-colored plaster walls, dark-stained woodwork running around doors with frosted glass.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Union Trust Company Building is an example of grandiose revivalist and eclectic turn-of-the-century architecture--a symbol of the high status in which the financial community saw itself in this era. Although its architects employed modern steel framing, which enabled them to build a commercial structure twelve stories high, somewhat indiscriminately-chosen "classic" or "period" decoration (described at the time as "French Renaissance of the period of Louis XV") was applied to make the building superficially opulent. Fortunately the results in this case are imposing and pleasing rather than extravagant and muddled.

The Bank of America had been chartered in Providence in 1851. It was renamed the Union Trust Company in 1894, and by 1900 a new building was wanted. The community had prospered greatly and was proud of its financial progress: the use in the new bank building of stained-glass panels representing great banking cities announces indirectly that Providence considered itself a banking center also. The use of sculptural ornament and semi-heraldic details emphasizes solidity and tradition, despite this bank's corporate existence of only fifty years. Savings and Trust Review of September, 1904, furthers this thought:

The most prominent architectural feature of the business centre of Providence, R. I., is the imposing building of the Union Trust Company. Symmetrical in its proportions, strikingly ornate, of unmistakable solidity and durability, overshadowing all other structures, it at once challenges attention and admiration. Rising to a height of 12 stories, it stands a graceful monument of prosperity based upon sound financial methods.

The regulated formality of the design demonstrates a reaction against the freer, more imaginative--and more native--architecture of the two or three decades preceding the date of this building's construction. At the same time, the "rococo" ornamentation within the building displays a vernacular, rather than an academically correct, approach: the plaster decoration is symmetrical and linear, unlike the original and very plastic style. The space of the banking-hall is not "complex" and "sculpted," but straightforward, and enlivened originally only by the serpentine counter. Even the marble hallway of the 1920's enlargement is very plain in surface treatment except for the purposely impressive doorway to the banking-hall. Although the original proportions of the building were lost when it was enlarged, and the character of the interior diluted by renovations, the building still reflects the tastes and fortunes of its particular period and--in its prominent location--remains a focal point and a monument to Providence's growth, commerce and affluence.

After absorbing nine other banks and then becoming consolidated with the Providence National Bank, the Union Trust Company was in turn absorbed by the Industrial National Bank in 1957. The Industrial National Bank (having sold the building) now leases the ground floor as a branch office, and other concerns occupy the upper floors. This branch office is still called the "Union Trust Office" and is maintained in a state of elegance.
