DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Built as Bedford's first Methodist Church, the Bedford Historic Meeting House is a diminutive, temple-form structure measuring 30 feet wide by 58 feet deep. Flemish bond is employed on all but the rear wall, which is laid in American bond. The base of the building has been stuccoed in recent decades in a crude attempt to counteract a problem of rising damp. In the center of the rear wall is a small appendage which houses a large niche serving as the church's apse. Covering the building is a shallow, pedimented gable roof ornamented with shallow Greek moldings. The roof is supported by a king-post truss system and originally was covered with wood shingles. Sections of these shingles were preserved under the later sheet-metal roof. Directly above the pediment is a square belfry with pilastered corners and a louvred rectangular opening on each face. A stubby, tapered spire, formerly topped by a ball finial, rises from the belfry roof.

The church's facade is divided into three bays with twelve-over-twelve windows hung with louvred blinds flanking the center doorway. The doorway has double doors, each with five horizontal panels. Above the first-floor openings are three twelve-light windows; the end ones are pivoted and the center one has horizontally sliding sash. On each side of the church are two triple-hung windows with six panes per sash. On the south wall is a small door built as a slaves' entrance. All the openings are topped by rectangular lintels with turned corner blocks. A modern chimney is also on the south wall. The rear wall was formerly hidden by a late nineteenth-century, two-story frame annex, but this was destroyed by fire in 1977; the fire also damaged, but did not destroy, the church's roof.

The interior of the church is plain. Its main elaboration is the apse enframed by an elliptical architrave supported on paneled Tuscan pilasters. Opposite the apse is a simple gallery reached by a narrow winding stair in the southwest corner. Most of the original boxed wooden benches remain, but they were scarred when the ceiling fell during the fire. The church is currently undergoing restoration.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Bedford Historic Meeting House was erected in 1838 as the community's first Methodist church. Now the headquarters of the Bedford Historical Society, the simple but handsomely proportioned Greek Revival structure survives as the oldest religious edifice in the town.

Methodism arose in the Bedford area in the late eighteenth century. Bishop Asbury, founder of American Methodism, preached in the Bedford courthouse in 1794 and again in 1800. By 1838 the local congregation had prospered sufficiently to have its own meeting house. The structure it erected is in the temple-form, Greek Revival style which was popular among Protestant denominations in the region. With its pedimented roof and square, pilastered belfry the Church is architecturally akin to antebellum churches in Fincastle, Christiansburg, Floyd, as well as Bedford. The Bedford church is interesting because its side door, used by slaves to reach the gallery, is preserved.

By 1886 the congregation had outgrown the little church and left it for a larger one. Leading Bedford citizens, interested in the welfare of former slaves, were instrumental in having the building purchased by the Episcopalians to be used as a house of worship for the Negroes of that faith. Accordingly, in 1886, the building was reconsecrated as St. Philip's Episcopal Church. As there were no schools provided for Negroes at the time, a frame annex was placed on the rear of the building to serve as a day school for the children of the congregation. This remained in use until segregated public schools were established in the state. Scott Wood, the rector responsible for the founding of the school, later became a principal of St. Paul's Polytechnic Institute, a training school for Negroes in Lawrenceville, Virginia.

St. Philip's congregation merged with Bedford's white Episcopalians in 1968 and the church was acquired by a group of individuals interested in the building's preservation. This group became the nucleus of the Bedford Historical Society, formed in 1969. Renamed the Bedford Historic Meeting House, the building has since been used as the society's meeting place and for special community events. In 1977 a fire destroyed the frame annex and damaged the church roof. Restoration is underway.
