SUMMARY DESCRIPTION

The Country Cabin is a simple rustic log cabin, built around 1937. It is located in a picturesque mountain setting, and situated in a natural hollow surrounded by mountains. The property upon which the cabin is built is an imperfect triangle in shape, and roughly one and a quarter acres in size. Its landscape is rich with pine, walnut and peach trees. The cabin faces south, toward the community of Josephine. The Powell River runs directly in front of the cabin property, marking its longitudinal boundary.

The County Cabin is twenty by forty feet in measure. It houses a rustic stone fireplace, and boasts a tall ceiling comprised of sturdy chestnut log beams. A log porch extends twelve feet from the front of the cabin. The County Cabin has endured no significant alteration since its original construction and remains largely intact. It's rectangular plan and unpartitioned interior are reflective of its design as a community center.

ARCHITECTURAL ANALYSIS

The cabin is constructed of chestnut logs that were felled on the nearby Williams Mountain. The logs are saddle notched, and a wood chip and cement mixture serves as chinking. The cabin is twenty feet wide by forty feet in length, one story in height, and situated on a foundation comprised of ten stone piers. The cabin has a gable roof constructed of rough pine boards, sheathed on the exterior with plywood and rolled composition paper.

The only projection beyond the cabin's rectangular configuration is a one-story, gable-roofed porch, constructed of the same material as the main block. The porch extends twelve feet from the cabin, and is accessed by four stone steps.

The windows are paired, double-hung, one-over-one sash. There are three bays across the front and rear of the cabin, and one bay on each side of the cabin. A rustic stone chimney is located near the northwestern corner of the cabin, and a small chimney for a cookstove is located in the cabin's northeast corner. An original kitchen extension, located to the rear of the cabin, was removed in around 1952 by the State Highway Department for road expansion; however, work is in progress to reconstruct the kitchen facilities at the rear of the cabin.

On the interior, the floor is covered in tongue-and-groove pine boards that replaced the original damaged pine material. The notched chestnut logs and chinking are visible on the interior, as are the rough pine boards of the exposed roof framing. A cookstove and assorted Appalachian accoutrements complement the cabin's rustic construction style.

Country Cabin, Wise County, Virginia

Section number _____ Page _____

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Country Cabin, located near the town of Norton, Virginia, is significant under Criterion A because of its long-term use as an Appalachian-culture community center. From the time of its construction in 1937 until the early 1950s, the cabin was used for a variety of community-oriented events. Music lessons, cakewalks, applebutter making and visits by local banjo player Dock Boggs, who later played at Cargenie Hall, were all popular events at the Country Cabin. Returning to use as a community center in 1977, the Country Cabin has been continually used to promote traditional Appalachian heritage through music, dance, and cultural programs, echoing its original 1937 function and design.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The Country Cabin property was originally owned by members of the O'Neil family, residents of Josephine, a community located outside the city of Norton. Concerned with preserving the culture of her community, Katherine (Kate) O'Neil Peters Sturgill, daughter of Irish immigrants William and Henrietta O'Neil, sought the creation of a community center. William O'Neil, her father, is said to have agreed to donate the property to his daughter if could persuade local leaders to fund a community center. Indeed, Kate O'Neil was able to persuade local government officials to fund the project under President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Works Progress Administration Program.

About 1937, local young men began constructing a rustic log building to be used for recreational purposes. Once it was in place, young Kate O'Neil, who was locally-popular for her folk singing and ballad songwriting, conducted musical programs, taught guitar lessons, and organized community gatherings at the cabin. Also under the direction of O'Neil, the County Cabin was host to square dances, box suppers, and cakewalks. In addition, a local banjo player named Dock Boggs, who later played at Carnegie Hall, often joined O'Neil at the cabin to play music.

The onset of World War II brought the draft and the induction of many of Norton's young men to serve. This greatly depleted the population of individuals involved in managing the cabin events. The women in the community continued to manage the festivities in their absence, but community participation eventually dwindled. By the early 1950s there was little interest in the cabin's use as a community center, so the O'Neil family used the cabin as domestic rental property. Around 1952, when the State Highway Department removed the cabin's kitchen for road expansion, the cabin was sold to Bill Humphries, a local coal operator. Humphries continued to offer the cabin to renters for residential use.

In 1976, select Norton residents, including Led Ross, Vilas Williams, and Bruce Arwood, attended a birthday celebration in honor of Kate O'Neil's son, Fred Peters. At the O'Neil home located in Josephine, the Norton locals began reminiscing about past gatherings at the old cabin, which sparked a renewed interest in Appalachian community activities. Soon after, those who had attended the party began meeting each Saturday at another facility in Josephine.

The community gatherings became popular and resulted in the planning of additional festivities. Programs included a molasses stir-off, applebutter making, and regular Saturday-night musical programs, as well as many other traditional Appalachian arts and crafts that had disappeared from Norton's mountain life. The events became so popular that soon the facility was outgrown. The organizers began searching for a larger place to meet and attempted to obtain the larger, original Country Cabin that was once owned by Kate O'Neil and her family. Community leaders asked Humphries, the owner of the cabin, if they could again use it for cultural activities. At the time, the cabin was being rented to a family for domestic use; however, the renters were asked to relocate to another rental property owned by Humphries. Once they agreed to relocate, Humphries obliged the requests of the community leaders and returned the cabin to use as a recreational facility.

Since its resurrection in 1977 as a community center, the Country Cabin has featured musical programs similar to those that made it popular in the 1930s. Referred to tourists by the local Chamber of Commerce, the Country Cabin features cultural exchange programs with touring artists, and hosts regular Saturday evening events that are aired on local and regional television stations. Most importantly, the cabin conducts workshops in traditional mountain music, dance, and crafts.

In 1988, the owner of the cabin, Humphries Enterprises, deeded the cabin and property to Appalachian Traditions, Inc., a non-profit organization devoted to cultural programs and entertainment, thereby encouraging the cabin's continued use as a community center. Since 1988, Appalachian Traditions has endeavored to maintain the traditional cabin activities and offer the Norton community a means of preserving, perpetuating, and understanding the significant qualities of its Appalachian culture.

To accommodate Appalachian Traditions's increasing audience and need for performing space, the group's long-range plan is to construct a larger log building for use as a music hall. The revenues realized from this expansion will be used to rehabilitate the original log cabin as a mountain heritage museum.
